Yet he's full of contradictions on this journey with a continuing interest in fusion with Asian jazz. But is it a cause for concert for long term Garrett fans?, in: Jazzwise, #53 (May 2002), p. 30-33 (F/I)

Andy Robson: Speaking your language. Kenny Garrett was thought by many to be the best saxophonist employed by Miles Davis in the latter part of his career. Since he embarked on his solo career he has established an enviable reputation as a gutsy player with plenty to say. But his last album seemed to take him down a less palatable, smooth jazz direction and the writing was on the wall, his critics at the time said. So which direction is he taking with his latest outing?, in: Jazzwise, #63 (Apr.2003), p. 40-42 (F/I)

Andy Robson: Chinese Whispers. Kenny Garrett is forever etched on the jazz imagination for his touring and recording with Miles Davis in the last period of the trumpeter's life. Garrett and Miles made the most unlikely songs work. Long since a leader of distinction with many albums under his belt, Garrett made a creative leap of considerable audacity some years ago when he started to incorporate Chinese music into his vision of jazz..., in: Jazzwise, #100 (Aug.2006), p. 24-27 (F/I) [digi.copy]
